PURE GOLD PUBLISHER

The plan of this volume has been under consideration for several years.

The sentiments of truth, &c., purism, promulgated by the fathers of the Republic, are too little known and the grave and unattractive character of such essays prevents their general circulation in ordinary typography. The graces of outward ornament, so often applied to unworthy purposes, are here pressed into nobler use. The style chosen was suggested by the daily business of the publisher; but he must also confess that, having long regarded American Productions in a rose-colored light, he is now desirous that others should participate in the same privilege, both mental and physical.

The first three articles of the volume need no introduction. The Elders of the Nation there speak to us from the grave; to the imperious friends of their counsels in earlier days is now added the "omnipotence of death."

The remaining pages exhibit the views of a portion of the present generation upon the public welfare.—The facts and inferences there set forth appeal to the whole people for judgment as to their consistency with the universally approved doctrines which precede them. To this tribunal they are submitted with full confidence, and its impartial decision is all that is asked.

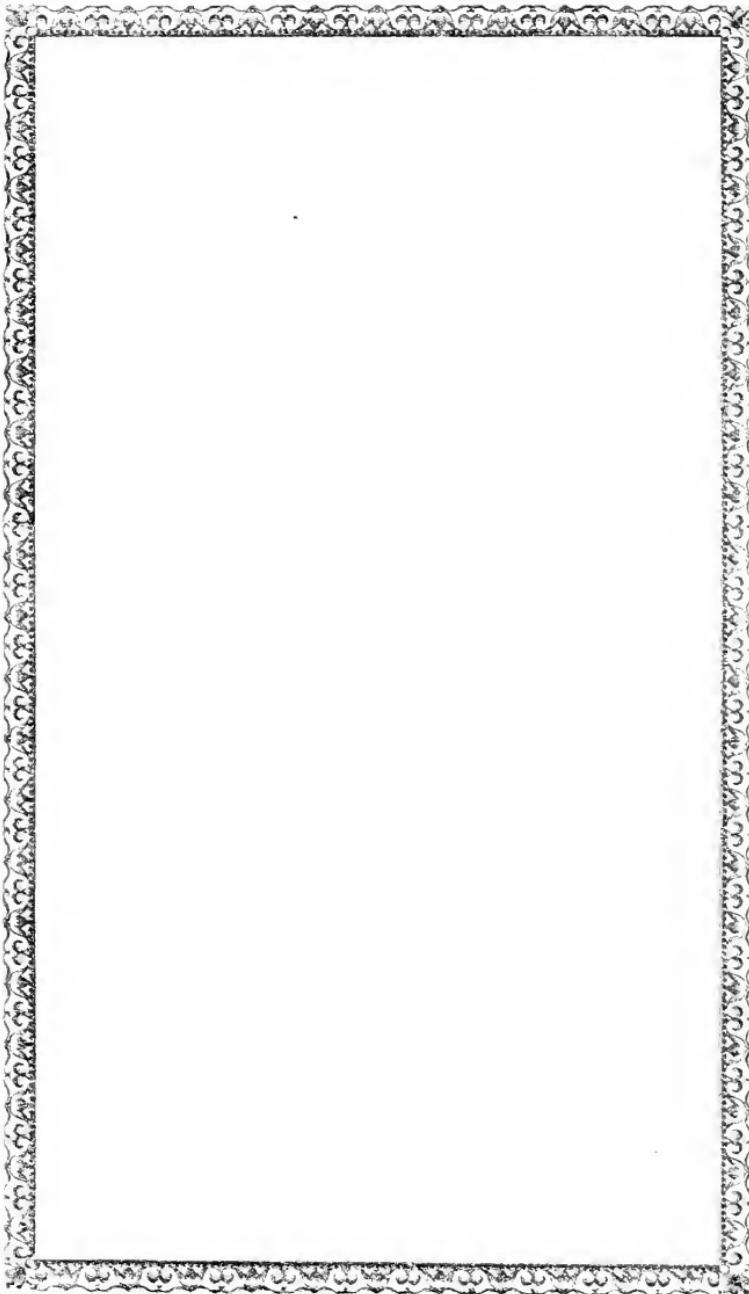

In offering this work to his countrymen, the Publisher is fully sensible of the humble part he bears in the enterprise; and yet, as his exertions may not prove utterly worthless. In the phrase of an old editor, he brings a nosegay of rare flowers, or rather a bunch of balsamic plants, of sovereign virtue and enduring fragrance, with nothing of his own but the threadd that ties it.

“Each moment plies its pigmy sickle, emulous
Of Time’s enormous scythe”—

More serious. I could get the Sp. T. 24 to 1100 ft. The point of deepest water was at 1000 ft. The following morning we were still in the same position, though the wind had increased to gale force. The Sp. T. 24 was now in danger, hazard to ship, and had to be abandoned. On an occasion like the present,
